What if, instead of avoiding or resenting money, we could heal our relationship with it?

Because we all have a relationship with money, whether we acknowledge it or not.

For many of us, that relationship is fraught with tension, shame, and unexamined beliefs passed down through generations.

In my new blog post, I share how a weekend intensive gave me a deep understanding of where my mindset toward money came from and how it has shaped my life and my decisions. It also unearthed how I can change it to serve me better.

What untapped insights could you uncover about yourself by integrating Live Journaling with personal knowledge management and your digital notetaking routine?

Join us for creator, writer, world traveller and polyglot Jo Franco's workshop at the Second Brain Summit and find out!

Live Journaling: A Creative Practice for Modern Self-Discovery will be a dynamic and vulnerable workshop, where Jo will introduce the practice of Live Journaling she's pioneered over the last few years as a timeless yet modern approach to self-discovery and personal development. Jo will demonstrate how Live Journaling can serve as a powerful complement to Personal Knowledge Management (PKM) and digital notetaking, including how to integrate journaling with digital tools to make it even more insightful and profound. We'll skip right past the small talk and connect deeply with yourself and those around you. No previous journaling experience is required. Just a notebook, pen, and good vibes.

I'm thrilled that Jo will be our MC at the Second Brain Summit – grab your tickets for the summit before they sell out: <https://buff.ly/4bpOx4H>

This is my checklist for my Weekly Review, which I keep in a little yellow stickie note on my desktop.

Humble and unassuming, but this short checklist represents something very meaningful to me:

The ability to go from total chaos to total clarity every week, in 15–30 minutes.

It's amazing how productivity improves when you see procrastination as a signal to reassess priorities, not as a character flaw.
